Son of Carter: Chip's trip

cheap shots

Chip shot

When Chip Carter steps down from his commercial flight at Columbia Metropolitan Airport amid other passengers, sans any Secret Service men we could see, he's still not hard to recognize. Even if the green and white Carter button he displays on his lapel were not there (none of the other passengers wore one) he would be easily discernable. This boy is a real chip off the old block, if you'll excuse the pun. And if how he looks is not enough, when you talk to him for a few minutes or hear him speak to reporters or a crowd, you're convinced this is the case.

His manner, gestures, smile, even his choice of words are Carteresque. If he said "travesty on the American people" or "disgrace to the human race" once, he said it three or four times during his short few hours in Columbia the other day. This boy had done his homework too. You were made to feel that you were experiencing the first debate all over again. Plugging memorized answers into tired, worn out questions seemed to come as easy to him as it comes to his father or to his father's opponent.

None of this should come as any surprise, though. Like he says, if he looks and sounds a lot like his old man it's because he's had 26 years to have a little Jimmy Carter rub off on him. If his answers sound like he's given them a thousand times, it's because he has. 1500 times, as a matter of fact, according to his own count. Chip is, by all indications an "Average Joe". It's as if you or I were thrust into the same situation. If he handles it well or seems relaxed in the role it's probably because he has been at it for more than 16 months in some 48 states. He wants to go home after this election, he says, "to live in my mobile home in Plains -- the second one down from the post office -- and farm peanuts." He says it three times in the course of the hour spent with him, but somehow his "I am just a country boy" is not convincing.

Maybe there is too much of the father in the son. His words seem to carry the abstractness that has plagued his father are "fuzzy", he contradicts himself at least twice. At one instance he talks freely about his religion or lack of it. He is a Christian, but is not born again. There is a difference in his mind between the two. He is a member of the church, but he doesn't put God in front of all other things; therefore he is not as deeply religious as his father. "He is the most religious man I know," he says.

Later Chip refuses to answer any questions about whether or not he smokes marijuana. "I don't discuss my personal life during the campaign; I just want to go back to Plains after the election...and farm peanuts," he says again. Although a man's religion has long been thought to be very personal he doesn't see it as such. He does, however, think that whether or not he smokes marijuana is too personal. Nothing else he is asked that day, including questions about his home and family fits into the "personal" category.

The other contradiction comes when he says that the Carter campaign is on the way up, that a new surge is beginning. He bases it, he says, on recent polls done by the Carter committee and by Gallup. Only a few minutes earlier when questioned about a recent poll that shows slippage in the Carter camp he says that polls don't tell you a whole lot. "It depends on who is interpreting them," he says. "There were two polls done recently where the two different pollsters were given the same data and each came out with a different conclusion." It also seems that polls are important or not important depending on who you are talking to about them, or according to how a question is phrased.

It's hard to think of things to ask Chip. You are sure that in the 1500 appearances that he has made that he probably has been asked everything that he could possibly answer. He admits that it seems that he is always asked basically the same questions over and over again.(Which sounds like an honest answer.) Yet he denies that he

The POLITICAL ECONOMY by Ed Meadows

Northern bigots

The Carter campaign for the presidency has, if nothing else, exposed a large vein of moral hypocrisy in the land. This hypocrisy has shown itself north of the Mason-Dixon line, and most particularly east of the Hudson River, in the intellectual gardens of New York. What it purports to suggest is that the people of the north are free of any prejudice, racial or religious. The converse is that the people of the South harbor uniformly evil and barbarous philosophies.

Well, the South's bad reputation is not so undeserved. The South did, after all, practice slavery. It has revered such illustrious swine as Bull Conner, Strom Thurmond, Lester Maddox, George Wallace and Leander Perez. Southerners have for generations seemingly applauded, or at least approved, some of the most corrupt outlaw politicians to ever besmirch the American Dream. And is it not in the South where the phrase "good, clean Christian fun" was coined to express the quintessence of Southern religious bigotry? There is the implication that "Jewish" fun or "Catholic" fun is somehow dirty and evil by comparison. The very idea of "good, clean Christian fun" is absurdly ridiculous in its dumb piety. The image comes forth of farm hands square dancing in a bare, well-lit church basement...but slipping out to the car now and then for a nip of hard stuff, and maybe into the back seat for an "unChristian" romp with Alma Mae.

H.L. Mencken, perhaps the best journalist America has known, lambasted the South in the 1920's and later for its plain sterility, but he was wise enough to know that such criticisms did not uniformly apply to all Southerners. No, Mencken averred that a Southerner of good blood, that is, of good breeding, was clearly superior to any roomful of Yankee bounders and merchants. Mencken noted that such a Southerner gained easy acceptance in the most sophisticated Northern circles. Mencken, in other words, did not make the same mistake that some Northern intellectuals are wont to make today. He did not construct the simplistic duality of good and bad, with all good residing in the North and all the bad resting in Southern lands.

For the North has its bigots too. The nature of some of these bigots can best be illustrated by the case of the Greenville PTA. Whilst living in New York a few years ago, I became acquainted with the PTA of Greenville, N.Y., a sub-section of Scarsdale in wealthly Westchester County, north of The City. I learned that each year the Greenville, N.Y. PTA "imports" a young black child from Greenville, S.C., in order that the youth might for a time supposedly escape the bullwhips and chains of a rural Southern existence for the bliss of life among the knee-jerks, the knee-jerk limosine liberals who comfort their simpleminded sense of moral superiority by such acts. Yet, one must wonder, what of all the thousands of poor black children in the hideous slums just to the south of Greenville, N.Y.? That is, why doesn't the Greenville PTA "import" a black child from the nearby horrors of the Bronx or Harlem or Bedford Styvesant? These children have to be living lives a hundred times more deprived than the life lived by your average rural Southern black child. For if the Southern black child undoubtedly knows a rather unpleasant poverty, the Northern black child of the ghetto knows it better. And not only that, he knows as well the fear of walking on crime-infested streets, streets strewn with garbage, streets lined with the stark skeletons of abandoned cars, streets framed by rows of boarded-up, gutted, vandalized abandoned buildings.

> "...In many a northern city, a white person can busy himself all day long without ever seeing a black person, for the blacks are confined, so to speak, to isolated ghettos ..."

But you see, if the Greenville, N.Y. PTA "imported" a poor black child from a New York ghetto, then the PTA would be faced with the complex and unpretty problems of northern segregation, northern racism, northern hypocrisy. Naturally, the liberal bigots of the Greenville PTA vastly prefer to "import" a child from the faraway South, thus to preserve the silly storybook mythology of the "good" North and the "evil" South, a mythology as phony as "Gone with the Wind".

The fact is that, until very recently, northern whites have seldom had any chance to come into contact with black people. Hence moral superiority has been rather easy. Even today, one rarely sees a black face north of New York City and blacks are a precious few, scattered only in urban pockets of New England (Boston's notorious Roxbury ghetto contains the majority of the population of Massachusetts blacks). With such a scarcity of blacks, no northerner's presumption of all-embracing brotherhood has had an opportunity to be tested by reality. But as blacks began to fill the central cities of northern metropolises, and as blacks began to make their presence known, then the spirit of racism arose in the north, and today northern cities are rigidly segregated by housing and by neighborhood. In many a northern city, a white person can busy himself all day long without ever seeing a black person, for the blacks are confined, so to speak, to isolated ghettos.

But what a contrast in the South! Here blacks are a relatively large portion of the population, and indeed make up at least 50 per cent of the population of most Southern cities. And no matter how large or small a Southern city, it generally contains a mixture of neighborhoods, hardly isolated from each other. Does one find a block of homes owned by affluent whites in the Southern town? Then be not surprised if a block of homes owned by blacks is adjacent. This is rarely the case in the urban North.

What it means is that the average Southerner knows how to get along with black people, for he's been doing it since Reconstruction. He lives in close proximity to black people, works with black people, and if he is a shopkeeper, black people likely comprise a substantial part of his patronage.

The Northern liberal, then, might talk loudly of his freedom from racial prejudice, but that alleged freedom is rarely put to the test. And when it is put to the test...well, the last time I was in New York, circa 1974, I heard the word "nigger" up there twice as often as I hear it down here, except as uttered by blacks). Perhaps it's no surprise that blacks who once migrated North to escape the very real oppression of the old segregationist South, blacks who sought factory jobs or public assistance payments they could live on—these blacks are moving back South. And perhaps it will still come to pass, as Congressman Andrew Young said a few years ago, that in a decade or so Atlanta, not New York, will be the most liberal city in the nation.

Jimmy Carter's campaign has perforce exposed the nerve ends of Northern bigotry, and such bigotry is no less ugly that Southern bigotry. The lesson is finally that no section of the nation has a corner on the market for moral righteousness. A corallary is that the South, at its best, might teach the North a few things about racial harmony, not by the rantings of its idiot politicians, but by the quiet actions of its citizens.

finds himself giving the same answers over and over to the point where the answers seem to run together. (Which sounds like a dishonest answer.)

He is 26 years old, but he has never read a Playboy magazine. No sneaking to the neighborhood drug store to peek inside the centerfold when the druggest is not looking? Isn't it a natural thing for a boy to do? Somehow you feel that somewhere back in Plains, one of Chip's co-conspirators as a child is getting a good chuckle out of Chip saying he has never read a Playboy. He has never known his father to read one either nor has he ever heard him use the kind of language used in the already too publicized interview he did with that magazine. An old Navy man at that. Quite an accomplishment.

Earl Butz' comments are a "travesty", he says. "One reason I am campaigning is so my father can go to Washington and fire Earl Butz. I plan to be there for that." Little did he know that he would have once less reason to campaign just a few short days after he made that statement. It has turned into a tit for tat campaign. Each side jabbing the others mistakes down their respective throats. But reporters love the controversy and manage to pry out of young Carter that his father apologized to the Rev. Billy Graham for a statement made about him by Chip's younger brother, Jeff, regarding the cost of Graham's Doctor of Divinity degree. (This will be their lead story tomorrow. A scoop, of sorts.) Chip does not agree with the statement, but he looks a bit confused about what he has revealed about his father's statement to Graham, as though he has, perhaps, slipped up.

After the press conference he joins several hundred students on the patio at the University of South Carolina student center. He talks for less than five minutes due to the fact that the microphone will be shut off in that amount of time because classes are in progress. He is four courses short of graduation from college, he tells the crowd, and one of those courses is speech. He reveals that he has failed the course twice, but that he hopes that after having made more than 1500 speeches since he started campaigning that he will do better next time.

Afterwards he drifts into the crowd to squeeze the flesh. He seems to do this best, to enjoy it most. The crowd looks as though it responds to him and a circle 15 feet deep gathers around him. What he is saying to them cannot be heard, but the exchange looks comfortable. He looks comfortable, much more so than Susan Ford was just a few weeks ago when she visited here. He said earlier that he enjoyed the campaign, loved campaigning.

Later he leaves to make appearances elsewhere in the state, and you are left wondering about him and the Carter family. You have learned little about him that you didn't already know. But you are also left with the feeling that the whole thing is too Reverend Moonish or Nixonian, a man wanting to be President as bad as Carter wants to be. Like Nixon in 1968 you feel you know so little about the man and what his words translate into. The family is too unusual somehow, too much of a spinoff of "Father Knows Best" or "Life with Father". The family and the man seem too unreal to be true.

What good these family campaign appearances do probably cannot be gauged, but they are given much coverage, as if the news media were starved for a story on the campaign. When they are over you don't have anything of substance, but perhaps, as they say, people's interest has been re-established. People will somehow turn out in greater numbers to work for Carter, they allege, but if you weren't convinced before Chip came to town you are probably not convinced now.

Pilgrim's Progress

Three hundred years ago in a prison in England a Baptist tinker wrote a book. Pilgrim's Progress was an allegory whose humble author tried to inspire a nation to produce good and great leaders to meet dire and terrible dangers. The leaders included Mr. Honest and Mr. Standfast and Mr. Greatheart and, above all, Mr. Valiant-for-Truth. Valiant-for-Truth delivered captives from Doubting Castle and Giant Despair. It is one of the world's great books, written by a man (John Bunyan) who slept on straw; it is noted for its simplicity of style, its spiritual fervor, its thumping combats and its universal applicability. Teddy Roosevelt got the term "muck-rakers" out of it.

A combination of this dreary election, the enactment of the omnibus tax bill, and the death the other day of Senator Paul Douglas made me turn back to the book. It is irresistible if you dip into it — the children in the pilgrim band, for example, who complain the stubble hurts their feet but who with proper encouragement set out again "and made a pretty good shift to wag along."

When Paul Douglas was wounded at Okinawa, having enlisted at 50 as a buck private in the Marines, they asked him at the battle station as he bled profusely if he were an officer. No, he indicated feebly, though now he was a captain. He was near death's door (or as Bunyan would have put it, the door to the Celestial City) but he did not want special treatment because of rank.

Or again, after he was a senator and a constituent gave his lean treasury $1000 in Illinois, and the donor called on him later in Washington. They coversed amiably till the visitor said, "By the way, I gave your fund a check; I have an interest in a federal judgeship."

"I am very sorry you said that," said Paul Douglas gravely. And he called his Chicago manager on the spot and told him to return $1000 immediately to Mr. So-and-So.

There are men in Congress over the years who seem to come out of John Bunyan — good and bad types, almost legendary figures, some like Mr. Facing-both-ways, Mr. Two-tongues and Mr. Worldlywise. Some few, like Bob LaFollette, father and son; and Carter Glass and George Norris and, of course, that rumpled, powerful, white-maned Paul Douglas with the useless arm, are the Stronghearts. They are men, often, of presidential caliber who under our system, don't become President. Some battles Paul Douglas won, others he lost, yet it is astonishing how many "lost causes" are revived already; how often when a reformer ultimately comes in sight of victory and thinks he stands on virgin ground he finds the tracks of an earlier, half - remembered figure there before him.

Giant Despair

It can work the other way. Paul Douglas as much as any man pushed through the civil rights legislation; but now there is a President who wants a constitutional amendment to modify the Supreme Court's busing decision; and only last week the Senate saw a Bilbotype filibuster to block public interest groups from receiving attorneys' fees in civil rights cases.

Paul Douglas 25 years ago attacked that grandaddy of all tax loopholes, the 27-and-one half percent oil depletion allowance. He failed. Big majorities laughed at him. What fool would attack Giant Despair? Yet in 1969, two years after he left the Senate, the allowance was cut to 22 percent; in 1975 it was chopped off altogether for the biggest oil companies, though retained for the smaller.

"It has been the extremely able," complained Paul Douglas, a distinguished economist himself," "who have inserted these loopholes in the tax laws. The large hearing room of the Finance Committee seats 150 persons. When we considered a tax bill the room was full of prosperous lawyers, graduates of great universities and of the top-ranking law schools, all working to hold what they and their clients had, and to enlarge it.

"In the halls outside the hearing room the lobbyists are thick as flies, while the publicity men and the noisemakers are busily at work. Erudite professors train their students in the intricacies of the tax code so that they may help wealthy clients avoid taxes. A particular measure would mean millions to a few, but only a few cents to each of 200 million Americans."

Mr. Smoothman

Yes, in the anteroom are Mr. Smoothman, and Mr. Worldlywise, and the agents of My Lord Turn-about, and maybe even the parish parson, Mr. Two-tongues. Douglas called them "well-clad pirates with impeccable credentials." Look at today's 1500-page tax bill; their work is all over it, though it could have been worse (and was, coming from the Senate Finance Committee)!

The pilgrims pick up recruits along the way, wrote Bunyan from his prison. It is surprising how they will face dragons and monsters quite stoutly, if Valiant-for-truth leads them: Mr. Feeble-mind, and Mr. Ready-to-halt, and those two rescued from Doubting Castle — Mr. Despondency and his daughter Mrs. Much-afraid.

What startled Paul Douglas was how spokesmen of the special interests "seem to regard their national government as their enemy and as something malign to be hated." He wrote, "the main mass of the general public and even of the academic profession stand by as mere spectators and allow without protest the power juggernauts to conquer."

Bunyan was thrown in prison for unlicensed lay preaching 300 years ago and slept on straw and wrote enthralling books. The question he posed was the one Senator Douglas asked in our lifetime, "Where are the champions of the people? Where are the men, better and more effective than we who have tried and lost, coming from?"

When the end came for Valiant-for-truth Bunyan tells the story quite simply, He distributed his possessions cheerfully: "My sword I give to him who shall succeed me in my pilgrimage.

"My marks and scars I carry with me, to be a witness for me that I have fought His battles who now will be my rewarder ...

"So he passed over, and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side."

The governor's credibility gap

by Jim Walser

It was at the end of a lengthy interview with Osceola a year ago that Governor James Edwards chose to emphasize what he considered his close, casual — and important — relationship with the state's news media.

A very large part of what his Republican administration would be able to accomplish, Edwards said, depended upon his ability to get "the facts" to the people. "We've got to be able to work with you people in the media," said Edwards, "in order to get the information on important state issues to the people of the state."

Getting factual, accurate information to the masses would, of course, be a worthy goal of any governor's administration, but for Edwards the importance of cooperation from the media was even more acute.

That's because Edwards' imagined himself and — if recent events are any indication — continues to imagine himself as very much a "Lone Ranger" figure inside state government. Since he is the first Republican governor to hold office in some 100 years, and because he operates in a state governing apparatus dominated by the loyal opposition, a certain amount of paranoia has crept inside his administration. And paranoia is by far the kindest reason being suggested for the recent escapades that threaten to destroy his bond with the Capitol Press Corps.

A less kind theory is that the cover-up gamesmanship that Press Secretary Robert Liming and Edwards have been playing with the press corps in the past few months suggests that perhaps there is really something there to cover up. The name — the printable one at least — that is being directed toward Liming is that of Ron Zeigler, President Nixon's old hachet man/press secretary, the individual who probably did more than any press secretary on any level of government or politics in recent years to make deception and — well, lying — an acceptable code for paid press secretaries to live by.

The evolution of the press secretary in government and politics in the U. S. is one of the more interesting para-journalism stories of recent years. Originally, Presidents and others hired press secretaries to work with the press on a regular basis — the primary objective being to enhance the press' ability to cover the White House, HEW or the Statehouse. But as candidates and government operatives were increasingly sensitized in the 60's to the importance of what was written and aired about their candidacy or agency workings, public relations representatives, often called press secretaries, proliferated at a rapid pace. This process continues today. In his recent book, "A Ford Not a Lincoln," journalist Richard Reeves cited figures that indicated the executive branch of government alone spends more on public relations personnel than the entire news/editorial budgets of Associated Press, United Press, the three television neworks, the New York Times and Washington Post combined.

On a statewide level, the proliferation of press agentry — and the accompanying puffery — has been just as marked, an uncharacteristic development in a state that has always prided itself on fiscal conservatism and lean budgets — "no frills" government as it were.

The governor's office, of course, has a liberally funded and staffed office, headed by Liming. But the trend runs deep in state government. USC and Clemson have elaborate public relations set-ups charged with telling their story — and justifying their millions of dollars of state appropriations. DSS and the other agencies have their own personnel. The first position that a candidate on the move usually fills — witness the rise of Jimmy Carter and Jody Powell — is that of press secretary.

The problem is not the concept of press secretaries or public information offices per se — and it's not even the miles of mostly self-aggrandizing copy that spews from them. Most of that is taken by conscientious editors for what it's worth. Instead, the problem springs from loyalties, which sometimes get misplaced along the road to public service.

Zeigler, naturally, is the most notorious example of the overzealous aide, and perhaps he is not one who should be cited as representative of the class as a whole. But Zeigler, a former advertising operative and tour guide at Disneyland before performing for five years as Nixon's chief mouthpiece, is the name that comes to the tongue when reporters question the growing power of the public relations establishment. Zeigler made deception and, later, outright lies the rule and not the exception during his tenure in office, and in doing so may have rewritten the book on whom a press secetary is serving. Zeigler worked for Richard Nixon and no one else. The $200,000 of public salary that he collected in his five years at the White House might lead some to wonder whether he did not work for the public, rather than the man; but Zeigler never labored in doubt about his mission. He worked for Dick.

All of which brings us to Liming, whose crimes look petty beside those perpetrated by Zeigler, but who has established a disturbing penchant for "non-truths" nonetheless. What further complicates Liming's predicament is the fact that he is not a former tour guide at Disneyland or advertising mogul, but is a former journalist. As a reporter, Liming was generally regarded as a fair and aggressive individual who would wade into a story — no matter how touchy — far enough to get to the bottom.

In 1974 after Edwards was elected, campaign operatives began to survey the Columbia press corps for possible names for press secretary in the new administration. More often than not the name mentioned was that of Liming, who had worked for a time as Albert Watson's press secretary during the 1970 gubernatorial campaign before joining The State. "I know that's who I told them and I know at least two or three other reporters who suggested Liming's name," said a member of the Capitol press corps this week.

But Liming's honeymoon with the press corps began to wear thin before the Republican National Convention, when he misled a reporter concerning the possible visit to the state of vice presidential aspirant Richard Schweiker. Liming told the Greenville News' Tom Mason that no "Reagan people" would be coming in to the state on the day Schweiker arrived for a politically sensitive meeting with the S. C. delegation. Later, Liming explained that Reagan campaign operative Lyn Nofzinger had been in town for three days when the question was asked of him by Mason, so Nofzinger wasn't coming in, in the strict sense, to meet with Edwards. And his defense of the Schweiker ommission was that he didn't consider Schweiker a "Reagan person," again, in the strict sense.

At a stormy meeting of Sigma Delta Chi, the journalism organization, the other day, Liming admitted that not notifying the press of Schweiker's visit was a mistake, and that he was fully to blame, not Edward's. Liming said that when the pending Schweiker visit came up for discussion at a poolside meeting, he warned the governor and other aides that the secrecy might cause trouble with the press corps. Liming said he "acquiesced" when the others weren't as worried about press hostility as he was, which, if true, might suggest that Edwards is calling the shots when it comes to public information.

The problems began to complicate when the Republicans met in Kansas City, and a meeting was held in Liming's hotel room by Reagan

Alternative film comes to Columbia

If you've been to "Jaws" so many times you know all the big scares by heart, seen all there is to see of Marilyn Chambers, seen all there isn't to see of "Tunnelvision" and "Freebie and the Bean," given up on blaxploitation, sexploitation, and Columbia movies in general, consider this: starting next Friday, October 15, Columbia will have its own alternative theatre to showcase recent hard-to-see foreign and American films and classic films of every description. The theatre is the Irvin-Fuller Company's flagship house, the Jefferson Square, and the series, which will run for 10 weeks, is an experiment by Columbia's dominant movie exhibitor to see if there really is an audience in the city for movies that aren't of a strictly commercial nature.

It's called the Irvin Fuller Classic Film Series, and after opening with Errol Flynn's "The Adventures of Robin Hood," will, for periods of three days to a week, bring in such varied selections as Ken Russell's "Women in Love," Alain Resnais's "Hiroshima Mon Amour," vintage Warner Brothers pictures like "The Maltese Falcon," "The Big Sleep," and "White Heat," and first runs of Bergman's "Face to Face," Lina Wertmuller's "Seven Beauties," and Bunuel's "The Phantom of Liberty." There will also be weekend late shows featuring a similar range of movies and off-beat shorts — independent films and cartoons — to accompany each of the programs. Background notes and film literature will be available in the lobby.

In charge of this series for I-F is Terry Dugas, and recently I asked him what the thinking was behind it. "The biggest problem" says Dugas, "is that such films are impractical on an individual basis." If, as is the case presently, foreign films are shown at random dates throughout the year, it's hard for those who would be most interested to find out about them while they are still in town. This is because such movies are usually borderline propositions commercially, and the company can't afford extensive advertising. Plus, even if it could, that might not be effective since the potential audience for such films are probably not regular movie goers anyway, would not read the movie ads in the papers. By putting the films in a series, potential customers can be contacted by mail and word of mouth, and given a definite date when the movie will appear. Also, it will establish a specific theatre that they can look to for those films.

Dugas continued, "We've got such a broad series that we like to think it's audience will come from all over." His rule of thumb in scheduling is to devote roughly 25% of the series to contemporary (that is, within the last two years) foreign releases, 20 to 25% to contemporary domestic films that don't ordinarily play in Columbia, documentaries or unconventional features such as John Huston's "Fat City," and the rest of the schedule to classics, both foreign and domestic. By this strategy, he hopes to not only draw in film buffs and University film students, but also families to whom Bogart or Bette Davis could provide G-rated entertainment that isn't necessarily for children. Thus, the series will open with Errol Flynn's "The Adventures of Robin Hood" and the succeding weeks will bring in such varied selections as Ken Russell's "Women in Love," Resngis's "Hiroshima Mon Amour,' "The Maltese Falcon," "The Big Sleep," and first runs of Bergman's "Face to Face," Lina Wertmuller's "Seven Beauties," and Bunuel's "The Phantom of Liberty." There will also be late shows featuring a similar range of movies and offbeat shorts — independent films and cartoons — shown with each of the programs. Program notes and film literature will be available in the lobby.

The series looks promising, but of course the big question is can it succeed. After the first ten weeks Irvin Fuller will evaluate the results, and if the movies have been sufficiently profitable (and that's the operative word), another series will be scheduled for sixteen weeks the following spring in the Fox Theatre. Here 16 mm equipment could possibly be installed, which would allow a greater variety of potential film selections. If the alternative theatre becomes firmly established, it would mean roughly eight months a year of operation, broken only by Christmas, summer, and a few other peak commercial film priods. It would also mean that many films that never make it to Columbia otherwise would get their chance, that the big foreign films that do make it would get here two to three months after their initial release as opposed to the present six to eight months, that a far richer variety of film experiences would be available to the Columbia Community.

But it all depends on what kind of support is forthcoming in the next few weeks. Irvin-Fuller has shown its commitment by giving the series financial backing and their best theatre; the question is whether those who care about movies in the Columbia area will demonstrate their interest as well.

Kudos for a new theatre

Sandi Shackelford and Harold Stockton

The new Hiers Dinner Theatre finally brings the dinner theatre concept, which has been quite popular in other parts of the country, to Columbia. For those unfamiliar with the idea, a dinner theatre is basically this: you arrive early in the evening (in this case 7 p.m.) at a cabaret style restaurant with tables grouped around a stage; a dinner is included in the ticket price and is then served along with music or some other entertainment until, after an hour or so, it is time for the play. During the meal and during the longish intermissions, drinks or wine are sold as well.

It's basically a theatre of convenience in which an entire night out is offered without the trouble of having to leave one place. It's also — and this is not necessarily to slight the legitimacy of the form — a kind of theatre in which only certain sorts of plays will be appropriate. The emphasis is as much on dinner as on theatre, and so the play itself becomes part of the entertainment package — a kind of souffle for dessert, or a bromo to help the digestion. Obviously anything as heavy as Albee or Beckett won't do and Shakespeare is unlikely; people settling down after a meal aren't going to be too interested in thoughty drama. Lightness and comedy are what's called for.

Well, probably the perfect dinner theatre play is Bill Manhoff's "The Owl and the Pussycat," which the Town Players have selected as their second production of the season. Using only two characters and a none too inspired situation, Manhoff has contrived an example of commercial playmaking at its best: fun but with a point and an underlying toughmindedness. It's the story of two unlikely inhabitants of modern San Francisco: Felix Sherman, a would-be writer and fulltime intellectual who makes his living as a clerk in a local bookshop, and Doris Wilgis, a would-be model and actress who earns her daily bread as a fulltime prostitute. These two come into contact when Felix "finks" to Doris' Landlord about her activities and she descends on him in the middle of the night demanding a place to stay. Not surprisingly, in the midst of their quarrel they soon find themselves falling in love, and the plot of the play lies in Doris' attempts to make herself sufficiently couth to please Felix' intellectual standards, and in Felix' efforts to rationalize his physical attraction for Doris as a subtle perception of her trapped spiritual being. The play ends as it must — with the collapse of both of their pretensions.

Manhoff's play is in the same vein as that well-to-do yoksmith, Neil Simon — that is, focussing on characters beset with those classic urban syndromes of anxiety and self-delusion — but he's a much wittier writer than Simon, and by concentrating on only two protagonists he has been able to expand them into caricatutes almost worthy of the classic comedies of manners. Doris, like Simon's Charity, has her whore's heart of gold, but she's also quite believable. She hums the jingles from TV commercials, reads Reader's Digest, repeats snippets of popular wisdom, changes her surname as often as her base of operations (but "I would never give up that 'W,'" she exclaims), and never goes to bed with a client to whom she has not been properly introduced. When Felix plans a romantic double suicide, she blows it by refusing to go along until she can do something about her ratty panties.

Still, Doris' character is relatively free from bunkum; it's for Felix that Manhoff reserves his choicest barbs. His is a character in basic, irresolvable conflict with itself since the facade of scornful rationality with which he shuts out the outside world inevitably crumbles before the physical need that Doris represents. As with Doris, Manhoff represents this identity crisis through the names. "I'm Felix!" he screams, "not Baby" as she calls him. As it turns out, he's neither Felix nor Baby but the prosaic Fred Sherman. Felix/Fred is smarter than Doris, but in the end we see him as Doris does, as far more of a phony.

These are both juicy parts for actors, and while it's impossible to imagine two more perfect performers in the roles than Barbra Streisand and George Segal of the film version, Sandi Shackelford and Harold Stockton are admirable. Ms. Shackelford has in some ways the most difficult part since Doris is so suddenly changeable in her moods — from fur up, claws extended to purring affection. Shackelford did well with both, although she perhaps could have been more abasive. The opening scene, in which she must come on in a fury, didn't really work (although this may be a flaw in the play; audiences and actors need a chance to adjust to the situation).

Stockton played Felix with an eye-rolling irritability and an affected accent that was, of course, entirely appropriate to the character. Felix is easily the best part, and his umbrageousness supplies some of the best lines — from a tirade against a telephone, "I wouldn't lose my temper at a helpless instrument of monopoly," to his literary output itself, a short story that opens with the line, "The sun spit morning into Werner's face." Felix is the pseudo-intellectual complete, and Stockton plays him in a properly mannered style while still revealing the character's slow, neurotic disintegration.

The other elements of the production, lighting, props, costumes, were all extremely simple but served their purpose. Blocking, as in any theatre in the round, was a problem. Director Lou Kaplan has done a competent professional job of staging, and in a comedy such as this one, that's all that really matters.

I have my doubts about dinner theatres; this whole mode of presenting theatre seems too limiting, and when you come right down to it, there aren't that many good, recent commercial plays floating around. Still, the very deemphasis on elaborate stagings and elaborate plays may be all to the good. A dinner theatre can afford to not take itself too seriously. Surely any organization that brings a play as funny as "The Owl and the Pussycat" to town ought to be applauded.

The bitter Vietnam legacy

by JOHN VAN DALEN

"Born on the Fourth of July" by Ron Kovic, McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1976

"When the delegates could see the attendants struggling to get Kovic up onto the stage, they did something that they hadn't done in four days. They became quiet. It was a deadly quiet, the kind of quiet you imagine in your dreams after an ear-splitting scream. The power of their guilt swept over them and obscured Ron Kovic's joy"

Rolling Stone Magazine

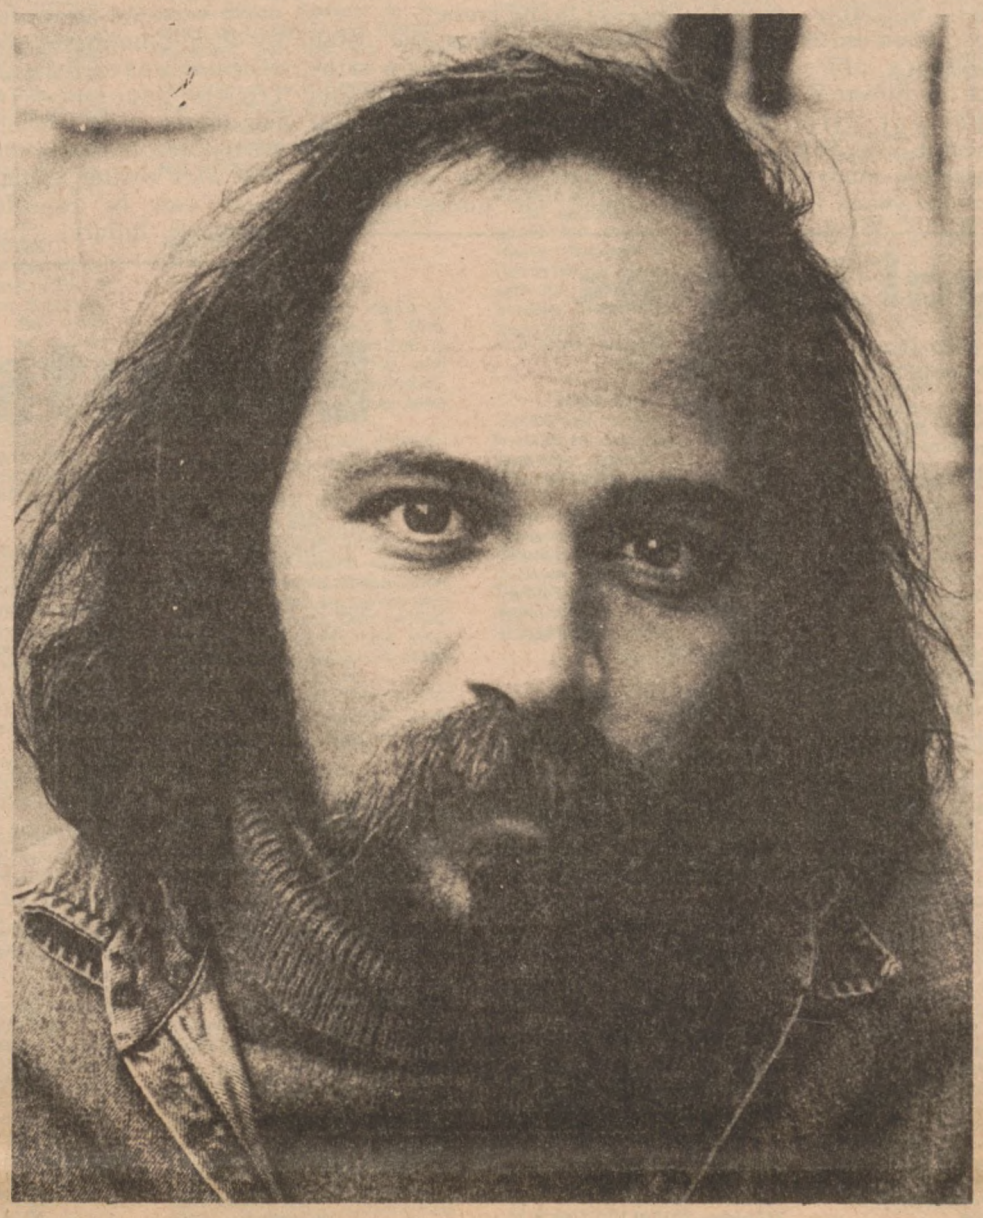
Prior to draft resister Fritz Efaw's speech to the Democratic National Convention in July on behalf of thousands of Vietnam war resisters, he was nominated for the vice presidency by Ron Kovic, a Vietnam veteran who was wounded and paralyzed from the chest down during a combat mission in Vietnam.

To the thousands of convention-goers, basking in the warm glow of unprecedented party unity, Kovic and then Efaw rose suddenly before them like apparations from a murky, shameful past — a belated Bicentennial reminder of what was not right with this country and of how we had failed to absolve ourselves, as a country, of the terrible guilt and tragedy inflicted during the '60's and erly '70's and which still lingers, sublimated in the collective consciousness.

"I am the living death/ The Memorial Day on wheels/ Your Yankee Doodle Dandy/ Your John Wayne come home/ Your Fourth of July firecracker/ Exploding in the grave."

Thus began Ron Kovic's nominating speech and it also begins his biographical account of growing up, his war experience and the aftermath of his tragedy. This is a remarkable book on many levels. It is an expression of one man's innermost suffering and pain and his attempts to surmount the grotesqueries of fate which left him without feeling in his chest, groin and legs. It is a book that he inevitably must have written, not just to spill out his guts and describe the horrible things he saw and experienced, but to create a vivid image of the forces which shaped him, which molded his heroic visions and which led him finally into the jungles of Vietnam. In the process he comes to a higher understanding of himself and a purging of the emotional bile that threatened at times to irretrievably embitter him to the forces of fate and the hopelessness which so often overcame him.

Kovic has succeeded in insuring that the reader is intimately drawn into his emotional catharsis, translated into a book that relentlessly details the screams and agony of the wounded that are both dying and awaiting surgery, and the horrifying recovery process where Kovic and others like him waited in line to be given their daily enema—then were wheeled into a shower room to be rinsed off. But often more frightening than the physical reality for Kovic were the endless periods of silence and imprisonment caused by having no feeling in much of his body and adjusting to the fact that he would not make love or run or be the supple athlete he once was.



"... a man whose innocent images of growing up had merged with a new understanding of a merciless war that had destroyed his body — and for what cause?"

This is an account that has all the force of an ultimate experience which has just occurred and which is recollected with such swiftness and intensity that there is no time to be merely numb with disbelief.

In between Kovic's account of his recovery in a VA hospital and the final chapter, which details his last confrontation with the war, is the account of his painful process of re-discovery and his growth as an activist Vietnam Veteran Against the War who spoke before any audience that would hear him and whose efforts culminated in an act of defiance before the Republican National Convention in 1972.

Kovic indeed became hardened in his resolve. Not long after he first came home, the home town folks gave a welcoming reception for him and another wounded veteran. Speaker after speaker mouthed "beautiful words about sacrifice and patriotism and God, crying out to the crowd to support the boys in the war so that their brave sacrifices would not be in vain." And the commander of the local American Legion got up and shouted that he believed in America, Americanism, and victory for America. But by now a different Ron Kovic was listening, a man whose innocent images of growing up had merged with a new understanding of a merciless war that had destroyed his body - and for what cause?

On another level Kovic's book functions to make the reader question his own attitudes and perceptions about the war, perceptions which for so many people have only recently been swept into the back recesses of their memories. It is an account of an ordinary American youth's experience with war - not that of a State Department official, a general, a correspondent or an emotionally detached social scientist.

Kovic grew up in a family of modest means in Massapequa, Long Island. His father worked at an A & P Food Store. Young Ron's life revolved around baseball, dreaming of the major leagues and leading men into battle like a hero. He sat in awe one day as a Marine recruiter told him and his schoolmates that the Marines had been first in everything, first to fight and uphold the honor of the country and that there was nothing prouder than to be a Marine. Ron Kovic was to feel very patriotic when he later signed up with the Marines.

Kovic, in a sense, was one of the "Chelsea boys" James Fallows described in a piece entitled, "Vietnam - The Class War." Almost all of the Harvard students that Fallows, a Rhodes scholar, knew and associated with, avoided the draft. He managed to receive an "unqualified" designation at his physical exam and was spared the realization of his worst fears. But he made clear later that the imprint of the disparity between those who went, such as the working class boys from Chelsea, and those who stayed was never sufficiently erased from his conscience.

Kovic placed his faith in a system and a pathology of war that he did not question intellectually. Fallows and millions of other students escaped without really thinking at the time about who would have to go in their place. As one student explained, "There are certain people who can do more good in a lifetime in politics or academics or medicine than by getting killed in a trench." Fallows concedes that this was, in a way, the rationale that spared the children of the bright, well-off parents who opposed the war in a "bloodless, theoretical fashion."

Ron Kovic is the truest kind of victim of the folly of Vietnam. But as he worked for an end to the war and as he embraced Fritz Efaw, the representative of thousands of draft resisters, one could see that, yes, it was a war fought by kids just out of high school who couldn't or didn't want to go to college. Those at the time who refused to go and went to jail or left the country became exiles without a country because they didn't accept the United States' premises that perpetuated the killing and bombing in Vietnam.

Joined together in the flush of victory at the Democratic convention, Kovic and Efaw symbolized the process of healing and resolution which now characterized their lives - a healing process which hadn't been completed in the country of their birth. For them the semantic differences between pardon and amnesty were irrelevant. They knew that their convictions triumphed over the acrimony of those who never really understood the meaning of the Vietnam War.

supporters not satisfied with delegate Sherry Shealy's endorsement of President Ford. Mason again asked Liming, three times he says, if a secret meeting being held in his room (Liming's) was responsible for a walkout during Shealy's nominating speech for Ford later that evening. Liming denied all knowledge.

There have been other instances, including considerable deception on the part of the governor's office in the hiring of the Robert E. Carlson management firm from California to make an administrative study of DSS. The State's Levona Page cited in a column recently several meetings that Liming ommitted from the daily schedule, meetings that may have been of interest to the press.

Then there was the "stag party" for some members of the press corps that Edwards and Liming tried to give on the night of the first Carter-Ford debate. The party was originally designed for males only, a "strictly social" affair. But Liming left it up to the invitees whether or not stories would be written — an innocent enough move — except for the fact that by discriminating on the basis of sex, he was excluding several female reporters from a legitimate news opportunity. After the editorials and stories that were written about it, the party can be considered a grandiose failure. "Tonight's stag affair' is consistent with his (Edwards') sexist image," the Columbia Record editorialized.

When Edwards took office, he pledged that openess and candor would be the "cornerstone" of his administration. Somewhere along the line, the foundation has weakened, and it is a problem that the governor and Liming need to give urgent attention.

CINEMA

ATLANTIC I THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790

"Jaws." The big money gobbler makes it back into town for the upteenth time, but without the original hype why should anyone bother to see it? A fairly competent but highly overrated adventure move. With Richard Dreyfuss, Robert Shaw, and Roy Scheider. PG. 2:15, 4:40, 7:05, and 9:30.

ATLANTIC II THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790

"Hot Nasties" is a first time porn ofering followed by the perrenial Marilyn Chambers favorite, "The Resurrection of Eve." X. Shows start at 1:15.

CAROLINA THEATRE, 1223 Main Street, 252-8011

"Brotherhood of Death." Black action picture, its only distinction apparently being that it stars a squad of Washington Redskins. Rated R. 5, 6:30, 8, and 9:30 with additional 2 and 3:30 shows on the weekend.

COLUMBIA EAST I THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"Blazing Saddles." The one about the black sheriff who comes in to save a lily-white Western town from outlaws. Mel Brooks at his craziest, but that doesn't necessarily mean funniest: the movie goes all out of control and tends to dwell on a few dumb scatalogical gags. With thankless parts for Cleavon Little (who gets the best bit, singing "I get no kick from champagne" in the first five minutes of the film), Gene Wilder, Harvey Korman, Dom DeLuise, and Madeline Kahn as Marlene Dietrich. R. 5:20, 7:20, 9:20, with a 3:20 show on the weekend.

COLUMBIA EAST II THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"The Other Side of the Mountain." The week's raft of replays include this sentimental tale about a professional skier (Marilyn Hasset) who has an accident and must rely on her husband (Beau Bridges) to see her through. G. 5, 7, and 9 during the week; 1 and 3 p.m. matinees are added on the weekend.

DUTCH SQUARE NORTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"Hard Times." During the lean years of the Depression a street fighter (Charles Bronson), his manager (Lee Marvin), and entourage (Strother Martin, Jill Ireland) become heroes by beating, against all odds, the brawny champions of the dock fights in New Orleans and vicinity. With Marvin, Bronson, and his wife, one fears the worst — another inane clobber movie — but the clean spare style of the film makes it an extraordinarily beautiful tribute to human endurance, (and simply to humanity since all of the characters are vividly real) and Bronson, since he is wisely given little to say, says volumes with that craggy, beaten-up face. This film is the poetry of faces; one of the finest pictures of 1975. PG. 1:40, 3:30, 5:20, 7:10, and 9, with the two early shows dropping during the week.

DUTCH SQUARE SOUTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"The Apple Dumpling Gang." Disney returnee starring Don Knotts and Tim Conway. G. 5:30 and 8 with features also at 1 and 3:15 on the weekend.

FOX THEATRE, 160 Main Street, 254-5212

"Sex With a Smile." Marty Feldman does the smiling in this sex comedy. R. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9; the two matinees are for the weekend only.

GAMECOCK I THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022

"Tunnelvision." Supposed to be a satire of television by showing what it might be like in the year 1985, but it's stupid and leerishly vulgar — like a porno comedy or a copy of Sick Magazine. You'll get more laughs by just tuning in to the new TV season. R. 5, 6:30, 8, and 9:30, with shows at 2 and 3:30 on the weekend.

GAMECOCK II THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022.

"Not Now Darling." We dunno about this one; probably a sex comedy. R. 5:20, 7:10, 9; more shows at 1:40 and 3:30 on the weekend.

JEFFERSON SQUARE THEATRE, Jefferson Square, Downtown, 254-6731

"Obsession." The obsession here is clearly not, as put forth in the obsession of Cliff Robertson with recreating his dead wife 15 years later out of someone who looks just like her, but director Brian De Palma's obsession with recreating the work of Alfred Hitchcock. This time it's "Vertigo," and if De Palma's homage with its incredible story and swiss cheese plot logic shows us anything, it's just how craftsmanlike a filmmaker Hitchcock was (and after all, what is Hitchcock's claim to fame more strongly than craftsmanship?). The performances range from a good Genevieve Bujold to a taciturn Cliff Robertson with an odd, crabby walk. The music, by Bernard Herrmann, is gorgeous, but like everything else in the film, derivative (in this case from himself.). Script by Paul Schrader. PG. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9 with no matinees during the week. On Friday, the 15th, the new alternative theatre will open at this location with "The Adventures of Robin Hood."

MIRACLE THEATRE, 1228 Main Street, 256-1950

A double feature of "Monty Python and the Holy Grail" and "The Groove Tube." The former is a medieval set satire by the British comedy team that is more pretentious and less funny (except for the credits and bits and pieces) than "The Groove Tube," a TV spoof from several years ago that shows what "Tunnelvision" tried to do and failed. They're both rated R. Call about the times. On Wednesday, the 13th, this theatre will open "The Marathon Man," a thriller starring Laurence Olivier and Dustin Hoffman. Times will be 2:15, 4:45, 7:15 and 9:45.

PALMETTO THEATRE, 1417 Main Street, 254-7690

"The Adventure of Sherlock Holmes Smarter Brother." Gene Wilder would have been smarter had he left off directing, writing, and starring in this takeoff on Holmes; it's obviously too much for a first shot at directing and Wilder misreads the part by trying to make Sherlock's insanely jealous sibling, Siegerson, romantic and sexy rather than funny. PG for this one, with features at 3, 5, 7, and 9. The matinees are dropped during the week.

PLAZA III THEATRE, 1323 Main Street, 254-7690

"The Godfather, Part II." A superb, lyrical transformation of the melodramatics of "Godfather I" into a deeply intuited epic of American life and corruption in the Twentieth Century. Francis Ford Coppola's 1974 sequel provides a historical perspective by showing the Corleone clan at its beginnings (with Robert De Niro as Vito) and at its close (with Al Pacino as his son Michael), and what comes in between, particularly the scenes of the immigrants on Ellis Island and in Little Italy, are like faded, blurry snapshots out of our past. Whether or not one accepts the theme of these two movies — that the Corleone family is the American way of life — the extraordinary performances and the dynastic structure make this one of the most beautiful American films of the Seventies. With Robert Duvall, John Cazale, Talia Shire, Diane Keaton, Lee Strasberg. R. 5 and 8:30.

RICHLAND MALL I THEATRE RICLAND MALL, 782-2228

"Gone With the Wind." Last time to see this epic before it goes on television in a few weeks.; you won't have to put up with commercials, but on the other hand, this theatrical release print has been cropped of its top and bottom to fit the wide screen. Shows are at 2 and 8.

RICHLAND MALL II THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228 , 782-2228

"Freebie and the Bean." Sadistic comedy about two fun-loving San Francisco cops who smash up a variety of cars and take a tour of the seamier side of urban life while trying to get the goods on an underworld bigwig. An ugly and cynical example of recent big studio (this one's from Warners) entertainment. James Caan and Alan Arkin (providing fuel for some uninspired ethnic jokes). R. 3, 5, 7, and 9.

SPECIALS

Group Counseling for recently divorced or permanently separated persons who are having difficulty readjusting will be held at USC Psychological Service Center beginning October 25th. The sessions will be held one evening a week for six weeks, and there is a deposit, refundable upon completion of the program. For more information call Anna Stout, Terry Heltzel, or Linda O'Neil at 777-4864.

The Gibbes Planetarium at the Columbia Museum of Science will be presenting a program through November 20th entitled "Space Junk" — about comets, meteors and other space debris with which astronomers have come in contact. Showtimes are Saturday and Sunday at 2:30 and 4 p.m. Call 799-2812 for more information.

A seminar on the topic "Sex and Public Policy," will be sponsored by Community Care, Inc. on Thursday, October 14 at Eastminister Presbyterian Church on Trenholm Road. Speakers will include Drs. Ron Baugham and John Scott Wilson of USC as well as Dr. George Anderson of the Lutheran Southern Seminary. The purpose is to formulate public policies with regard to such sexual/social issues as prostitution, homosexuality, pornography, and censorship. Those wishing to attend should send $5 to Sex and Public Policy in care of Community Care, Inc. 1611 Devonshire Road, Columbia, 29204 (phone 256-4925). The public is invited, and the times will be 9:30 to 3:30 on Thursday.

Synagogue and church leaders from throughout South Carolina are invited to attend an inter-faith program to be held at the Jewish Community Center in Columbia on October 14. A dinner will begin at 7 p.m., and at 7:45, an address will be given by Rabbi Balfour Brickner of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations in New York City. The final purpose of the meeting is to establish a South Carolina Christian-Jewish Committee. Registrations for the dinner ($3) should be mailed to the Columbia Jewish Center at 4540 Trenholm Road, Columbia, 29206. Registrations for the meeting ($1) should be received by October 11.

The South Carolina State Fair opens on October 15, and will continue through Sunday, the 23rd. There will be the usual rides and exhibits, daily grandstand shows featuring such performers as Judy Lynn, La Costa, and Jack D'Johns, and fireworks. Admission is $2 for adults, $1 for children. Special days include Fridays, Oct. 15 and 22 for school kids, Farm Bureau Day on Tuesday, the 19th, Senior Citizens Day on Wednesday, the 20th, and Kindergarten Tours on the 19th, 20th, and 21st.

ART

A display of ceramics by USC Art Professor Geff Reed will open on Sunday, October 10th, at the Columbia Museum of Art. Reed's pieces range from large sculptured jars to delicately glazed casseroles; he has had work in exhibits across the country from Massachusetts and Washington D.C. to South Carolina. All pieces will be for sale.

MUSIC

The Clemson Chamber Music Series will present a free concert featuring pianists Lillian Harder and Edwin Freeman on Tuesday, October 12 at 8 p.m. Both pianists are professors at the Clemson Music Department, and will play a variety of works by Dvorak, Rachmaninoff, Schubert, Poulenc, and Rummel. The performance is in Daniel Hall Auditorium.
